

The author describes the ways in which development performed in and by non-governmental organizations in one of Indian metropolises serves as a tool for reinforcing and upgrading social standing. She argues that the NGO environment gives a particular opportunity to middle class members whose cultural and economic capitals are being (re)produced in ...